WORKING FROM HOME GUIDE

Although COVID 19 means many of us are working from home for an unfortunate reason, the bright side is that we'll become more familiar with a style of work that is becoming more and more the norm.

Some or all of the tips shared in this guide can make your working from home (WFH) experience more rewarding and productive.

Conduct & Values – Don't Change

- Code of conduct and values do not change while working remotely.
- Ensure you remain compliant to the process and quality requirements.
- Make sure you are cyber secure and follow the IT policy guidelines.

Work from home (WFH), like any form of remote work, presents new challenges and opportunities that require you to approach work differently.

The great news is that you have more freedom and control over how you work, but to make that more impactful you need to align to your working style.

- Are you productive during early morning or during the day or evening
- Do you need a silent work desk
- What time during the day are you more creative

By figuring all these, you can better your WFH experience and environment around it, you'll be more productive and more satisfied. This is fundamentals of WFH.

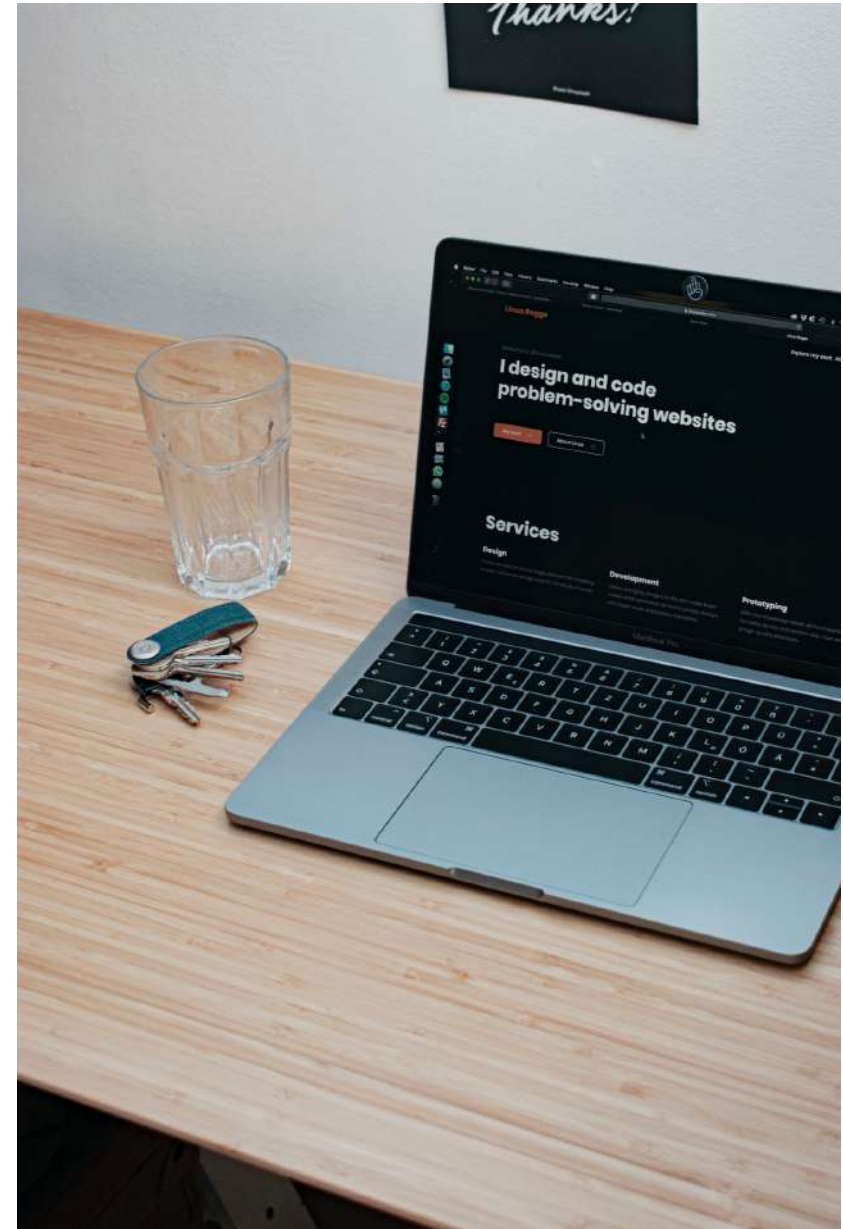

Take some time to sit down, understand your work-style better and use those insights to plan your approach.

A big part of effective working from home is making it feel like work place and the physical workspace you choose is central to this.

- What kind of workspace best suits your work-style ?
- Do you need a bigger or smaller table ?
- Will people being around will help or do you need a separate room ?
- Does a window looking out inspires you ?

Position your workspace in such a way that you can concentrate and have the resources you need.

If you're going to be working remotely for an extended period, try to make this workspace semi- permanent. Make the place feel like your personal space.

Work should be started on-time and that will ensure productivity and meaningful contribution

- The key point is to try and stick to your normal routine to work.
- Switch from 'Home Mode' to 'Work Mode'
- Create a strong association in your mind to start the work
- Make sure to start and end each work day at around your usual time. However, there will be natural tendency to start work earlier and stay late, because your commute time is zero.
- Create small rituals that indicate the start or end of your working day. Eg a cup of tea , saying a prayer or creating a to do list for the next day.
- Use signals such as closing a door when you are sharing the space with others or family.
- Communicate your work style to your family or the ones sharing your space as you need their understanding.

The key to working from home is clear communication with your leader. In office environment, leaders or managers are available in proximity to communicate easily and effortlessly. But in remote working, we have to make efforts to connect with managers.

Regularly checking on the work that needs to be delivered can help you be really clear about what's expected out of you.

May be, every day a meeting of 10 minutes with manager and team, will set the expectation for the day. This will enable clear and seamless communication.

Over communicate your progress and availability to colleagues. This will help maintain visibility and make others aware of your achievements

Try and use, tele-conference, video conferencing facilities like.. Skype, Life Size, Webex, WhatsApp, etc

Working from home has some unique stresses and social distancing from colleagues. WFH can even affect physically and psychologically. But there are things that you can do.

- Keeping in touch with your colleagues is vital and just email is not enough
- Find time for virtual coffee talks
- Make video calls to strengthen the social bond
- Have social chats and about work

Take care of your physical health. Stand once in an hour. Do some stretches. In morning, go for a walk or run. Exercise will boost your creativity and keep you active during the day.

HAPPY WORK FROM HOME
